Sandara Tang’s Wacom Intuos tablet

It is no secret that an individual’s online persona can be vastly different from what he or she is like in real life. This truly applies to Singapore digital artist and art teacher Sandara Tang.

Beneath a meek and mild exterior lies a wildly popular DeviantArt personality, who has posted more than 500 illustrations on the online artwork community, with each piece receiving more than 9,000 views.

The Singapore artist has also enjoyed commercial success working on projects such as Fantasy Flight Games’ Lord Of The Rings and Game Of Thrones trading card games. Her notable creations include Asfaloth, the steed of Queen Arwen, wife to Aragorn, a protagonist in the Lord Of The Rings film trilogy.

Ms Tang (no relation to the writer) was invited to the United States to attend Magic The Gathering Grand Pits in Chicago last June, for designing the playmats which the event’s competitors used.

She plays down her success, attributing it to her passion for painting and understanding clients. “Working for Fantasy Flight Games as a freelance artist was a great experience. There were little changes to be made to the original design which I created for each card and the communication process was smooth,” she said.

It has not always been a bed of roses for her. She knew she had the skills to be a professional artist, but she took an engineering diploma at Ngwe Ann Polytechnic to allay her parents’ concerns about job prospects for her skill set. Neither of her parents is an artist.

She said: “There was little opportunity for budding concept artists and game designers then. The industry was even unheard of at the time.”

Her fortunes would change when video-game studios such as Koei Entertainment (now named Tecmo) set up shop here in 2004. It made studying for another diploma and degree in multimedia art at the Lasalle-SIA College of the Arts Singapore all worth it.

She fondly remembers working as a computer graphics artist at Koei: “Although they brought over the strict Japanese work culture, it was great working for Koei. It was the first big video-game company that set up shop in Singapore.”

It paved the way for greater things and, eventually, led to her creating character designs for US video-game company Riot’s popular multiplayer online battle arena title, League Of Legends.

This shows how far she has come since her first pieces of fan art for the Final Fantasy VII video game. Today, she is a senior lecturer at the DigiPen Institute of Technology, but still works on freelance projects occasionally.

Her love for art and the fantasy genre seem to have rubbed off on her son, Drake, whose drawing of a dinosaur is lovingly displayed in her office.

She dedicated a painting to him when he was born. “My son is only four years old. He’s too young to appreciate it right now.”

Her Wacom Intuos tablet
I’ve been using tablets from Wacom since I first started painting digitally. I won this particular one as a prize and I like its durability and how it feels. I could create illustrations with a mouse and keyboard instead of a stylus, but that would take forever to complete.
